

The proposed FCC regulations should not weaken or reduce the existing Indiana Telephone Privacy Law.

Prior to Indiana's enactment I was receiving 2-3 annoying calls a week from anyone trying to sell insurance, or home improvements, or other service.

Most of these calls were right at dinner time. I do not prefer to do business on my home phone with someone who just calls me because my name is on a list or because I have a good credit rating. I inform these people to remove my name from their list, but I do not have any assurance my wish is being followed as was required by the former law.

Since I have added my name to Indiana's NO CALL List thes very bothersome calls have stopped and I have some enforcement to report groups that violate this law. I am concered that if the FCC laws superceed the State laws I will lose the relative comfort I now enjoy and will have no power to report these violators.
